Such additional precautions as keeping the cow in a stall higher behind than in front, and seeing that the diet is slightly laxative and nonstimulating may be named. If straining is persistent, ounce doses of laudanum may be employed twice a day, and the same may be injected into the vagina. If the womb has been cut of, injections of a solution of a teaspoonful of carbolic acid in a quart of water should be employed daily, or more frequently, until the discharge ceases. EVERSION OF THE BLADDER. A genuine eversion of the bladder is almost unknown in the cow, owing to the extreme narrowness of its mouth. The protrusion of the bladder, however, through a laceration in the floor of the vagina sustained in calving, and its subsequent protrusion through the vulva, ia sometimes met with. In this case the protruding bladder contains urine, which can never be the case in a real eversion, in which the inner surface of the bladder and the openings of the ureters are both exposed outside the vulva. The presence of a bag containing water, which is connected with the floor of the vagina, will serve to identify this condition. If the position of the bladder in the vulva renders it impracticable to pass a catheter to draw off the urine, pierce the organ with the nozzle of a hypodermic syringe, or even a very small trocar and caunla, and draw off the water, when it will...
