Excerpt from Shoe-Ology, or How to Buy Shoes and How to Take Care of Them: Illustrations From Photographs Royal Society of London, and became at once one of the noted men of the day. Notwithstanding he had never seen a tannery, his theories proved of incalculable value, and his discoveries were such as to mark a distinct era in the evolution of this important industry. It may strike the casual reader that leather is a very commonplace subject to attract so great a mind, but the important part leather has played in the domestic economy of our race in its gradual development from barbarism to civilization, makes it entirely proper. There is probably no other article that has been with us so constantly as this product of man from the skins of the beasts of the field, which we know as leather. Nothing ever devised by the hand of man has contributed so much to our personal comfort and physical well being. And so it comes about that every invention that cheapens the cost of leather, that adds to its durability or widens its...
