It is not necessary to indicate the tone at first, merely the important accents of the edge of the shadow; and to study whether the edge comes sharp or soft, and how sharp or how soft. I want here to call special attention to the necessity of making all these indications of accents with all the skill and care one is master of. After having shown a student how the thing is done, one s apt to come around and find a mere succession of spots put down unintelligently, without reference to the structural points, and the pleased scholar smiles on one as if he had done just what was desired. I have heard it...
