In 1966 Mel Bochner exhibited Working Drawings and Other Visible Things on Paper Not Necessarily Meant To Be Viewed as Art. The show simply consisted of four binders placed on separate plinths. They each contained photocopies of various material selected according to the title. Two years later, gallerist Seth Sieglaub published The Xerox Book. Featuring works by Carl Andre, Joseph Kosuth, Sol LeWitt, and Lawrence Weiner among others, the publication was a proposition for the exhibition catalogue as an artistic medium in its own right. Quite recently Mel Bochner's groundbreaking exhibition has been promoted through the publication of four completely identical catalogues. Instead of showing the four slightly varying photocopied versions of the original material, they have all rather surprisingly been made from one and the same photographic reprint. Seth Sieglaub's project is characterized by a similar paradox because in the end it proved far too expensive to produce a book made entirely photocopies. Thus The Xerox Book was duplicated using a regular printing press. Nevertheless, these two exhibitions radically transformed our comprehension of what art might be. But as Lucy Lippard has pointed out this so-called 'dematerialization of the art object' all too quickly turned into a sort of 'Xerox aesthetics'. Functioning as a very successful brand, this particular look gave conceptual art its pyrrhic victory as it led most of its social and political ambitions to a...
