Excerpt from Address Delivered Before the Hampshire, Franklin and Hampden Agricultural Society, at Their Annual Fair: Holden at Northampton, October 24, 1832 The genial influence of their successful introduction would be felt by all landholders and cultivators in the material diminution of taxes, and the rapid rise in value of real estate. The worth of lands is proportioned to their capacity of production, and their proximity to market. If, by encouraging the growth and multiplication of these establishments, we create a market at home, in our own neighborhood, perhaps, before our own doors, who does not see, that we materially increase the value of our lands, and render their cultivation more profitable? The establishment of a home market calls into action all the energies of the husbandman, and adds new zest to agricultural pursuits.
