Excerpt: . . . 11 unless the national forests substantially increase the output of timber. The logging sector will also decline. Im talking about the timber processing sector, but that would involve a decline in the logging sector as well as the milling residue processing sector and the use of wood fiber for fuel. Then looking to the future: Maintaining efficient milling infrastructure in proximity to national forests will have, I believe, substantial benefits, and some of them have been mentioned. With adequate industry infrastructure and timber the high-paying jobs in the forest products industry can be sustained, and based on some of our analysis even increased. The overall economic benefits, in addition to the jobs in the forest products industry, the overall economic benefits of improved forest ecosystem conditions, reduced fire hazard accruing from the ability to treat the forest can hardly be overstated and are so large that its very difficult to put a value on those outputs. They include not only reduced firefighting costs but employment and incomes from other forest-based activities such as travel and tourism, not to mention the improvement in quality of life that all of us would enjoy if we had to deal with less smoke in Montana, periodically, for example. Finally, relating some of our research directly to the forest planning process and addressing the area that you raised, Senator, on consistency among the forest plans, I can talk about a few of them. One particular area...
