Excerpt: . . . been at Versailles some time, and was to embark 1756, with the M. Bellisle: that the train of artillery, was prodigious, and the preparations both for defence and offence were immense: that they were determined to execute Bellisle's plan, though they were sure to lose all their vessels employed, and risk their whole kingdom: but that they hoped, by their number of boats, and superiority of fire from the heavy cannon, they were to carry they might form a safe passage, notwithstanding they should meet with the English fleets and that, in case they could, land their whole force, they would march directly to London and secure Portsmouth, with the battering train and the ships from Brest and Toulon. Refuted, Yet-if we attend to the following intelligence, it will be found that all these preparations and gasconades, were no other than feints on the part of France: it will appear that there was not near the like certainty of a resolution to make a descent on Great Britain, as there was on Minorca. The bugbear of the squadrons fitting out at Brest was known on the first of February to amount to, no more than a squadron under M. Perrier, to sail to St. Domingo another under M. Beaufremont, to guard the coasts, and a third under M. Conflans, to protect the French colonies So that. nothing was to be feared from the naval power of France in the...
