Excerpt from On the We-a Trail: A Story of the Great Wilderness The leaf-storm was ended. The sky was washed clear of every cloud and hung blue and brilliant above a little clearing in the Great Wilderness which the forest girdled with its primeval trees and bosage of yesterday. In this spot stood a small cabin. It was situated within gunshot of the puny stockade at the foot of the fall into which the creek at hand tumbled and foamed on its way to the great Quibache, miles farther on toward the west. On this spring day the cabin door again stood wide, and framed in its vacancy was the figure of a young, slender girl not yet developed to the full contours of woman-hood. She had paused on the threshold, with her face turned back over her shoulder, toward the interior of the room. Her voice - of that rare timbre, a combination of pleasant double tones - was raised loudly in talking to some one within. Yes, granny, she said, as if in answer to a cautioning; Ill surely get it....
