Not illustrated. 1910 Excerpt: .a foundation for a very large planer, which foundation had been built twice before, and twice failed to sustain the weight placed upon it. Upon removing the old foundation an apparently good bed of gravel was found. The engineer was not satisfied and ordered the excavation to be continued. Passing through this gravel bed the remains of an old cellar were encountered, which had been filled in with worthless rubbish which had been the cause of the former failures. With this removed a solid gravel bed was found upon which a successful foundation was built. Fourth. Still another case was that of a factory building located on ground that was slightly lower than much that surrounded it, and the question of drainage was overlooked. There were no sewers available, and to construct one would cost half as much as the building itself. The only plan left...
