In this Bannana book I write about some of my near death experiences. As Steve Jobs explained, during his seminal commencement address at Stanford in 2005, delivered shortly after he knew that his life was destined to end prematurely, all of life is a near death experience. Or should be lived as such. Live every day as if it is your last was one of the profound messages Steve delivered that day. Follow your passion, even if you don t fully understand where you are going. Go from one dot to the next dot. They will be connected, in retrospect. I was not in the audience that day. I did not attend my own Stanford commencement in, 71 because I was on my way to Mindanao State University, in the southern Philippines to begin a teaching job there with Stanford s Volunteers in Asia program. I experienced numerous near death experiences during my 18 months travelling the Philippines that are recounted in the book. When my mother died I found, among her possessions, typed versions of the handwritten letters I had sent her from the Philippines, providing me a precious look back into those years. This book draws extensively on those discovered letters, and a journal I kept, and saved. It describes near death experiences on skis that I experienced in youth, following Steve McKinney, the first human to go over 200km an hour on skis, on mountains in North America. Steve and I were planning to write a book together. He was killed in his sleep, in the back of his car, on the side of Highway 5 in California, after surviving feats like hand gliding off Mt. Everest. (Death...
