John Wiley Sons Inc, United States, 2016. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book. The planet is undergoing a global change in climate that has begun to negatively affect populations and is predicted to accelerate in the coming decades. The human beings now on Earth are the first to exist when the climatic dynamics of the planet are scientifically understood. That understanding makes patently clear that the aggregate effects of human activities have a distinct impact on planetary climate and the way humans will live, if they survive, in the future. This appears to be a tipping point time in human history when future climatic catastrophes that threaten generations of humans might be preventable if governments, institutions, and organizations now take mitigating actions. That suggests that the people currently alive on the planet bear a collective responsibility to address the negative human impact on climate. In recent years global climate change is a major focus of research among scientists, economists, and political and legal theorists. It is also a blisteringly hot discussion topic among politicians, leaders of governments, and social media commentators and bloggers. There are hundreds of thousands of sites on the Internet that raise issues, either directly or indirectly, focused on climate change or that flatly deny the overwhelming weight of the scientific evidence of its existence or that the activities of humans worldwide are a major contributing factor. Political parties in the United States (and in other countries) have adopted policy and platform positions ranging from denial of human-caused climate change, while championing existing fossil fuel industries, to dire predictions of the end of civilization unless radical changes in governmental policies and human activities are taken. The challenge of mitigating global climate change is often seen as potentially met through various kinds of scientific research, engineering (including...
