Excerpt: . . . feel that starvation, and the enmity of the entire Principality would be light in the balance. I couldnt give you the faintest notion of what we talked about, for I really dont know. What I longed to ask, but couldnt very well, was about how often this dreary ceremony had got to be gone through. Will it have to be weekly, or monthly, do you suppose, in order to carry conviction to the mind of the Cambrian farmer LETTER XXI July 4th. You complain of my silence; and I thought I had been exercising the most commendable self-control in refraininof from writing. Why, I thought, should I bore her with constant letters Nothing happens to me; I have nothing fresh to tell; I have seen no one new; I have described the place and its neighbourhood. She cant be anxious about me; she knows I am never ill, and the amiable design to starve me out came to an end almost before I had realised its existence. If I write, I shall only write about myself and my own feelings, which is bad for me, and self-indulgent, and morbid, and I shall probably grumble, and very likely make her unhappy. So I refrained even from bad words, but I beg you to believe that it was pain and grief to me. Oh, Milly dear, I wish I hadnt written those last words, theyll shock you. I knew I should do something in bad taste...
