Excerpt: . . . is thick and strong, and there is a moderate throatiness; shoulders are broad and sloping, and very muscular; the loin arched and lithesome; the chest broad and very near the ground; forelegs muscular and bony, and crooked--the knees turned in, so that the ankles nearly meet (if the elbows are out, it shows the dog has been tampered with); the feet large, muscular, and well turned out, and with strong black nails; thighs extremely well developed; the skin is loose enough to hold two dogs instead of one; the coat should be short and fine, close, and satiny; the tail is somewhat houndy, it is carried rather low, and has a sort of pothook bend at the end of it. The colour is of least importance; they are generally either fallowred, black-and-tan, or liver-and-tan. There is also a larger breed of Dachshund, used principally...
