We point to our public schools as the place where all are educated. But have you never noticed how few out of the whole number of school children ever reach the high school? And of the high-school students how very few of them ever complete the course of study and graduate? The city of Topeka is probably a fair sample. There were in 1890, in what may be called the primary grades, children; in the intermediate schools, in the grammar grades, 642; in the high school, 250; 49 graduated from the high school. It will thus be seen that, out of an annual school attendance of the finished product consists of only 49 graduates.
