Is War ever justifiable? Many seem inclined to decide this question in the negative. From the tone of their remarks, one would suppose that it were better to suffer any and all calamities rather than appeal to arms as a remedy; that not even the preservation of national existence is an object of sufficient magnitude to justify the shedding of human blood; that to rejoice over victories which, though they may have saved our country, have nevertheless been gained at the cost of precious lives, is unbecoming a Christian people; and that no church, or minister of Christ, can consistently offer public thanks to God on an occasion associated with so many bloody...
