If we can t break that up we may as well close up our schools of education in universities and leave the preparation of teachers to separate teachers colleges where getting ready to teach is socially proper. One of the best ways of making it socially proper for men to get ready in universities to teach is to have a professional fraternity which has a membership with all the graces prized by college men. The standards of admission should be such as to make the group life appeal to real college men. There should be such a mixture of social and professional in the activities of the fraternity that the men will recognize virility as one of the essential attributes of a teacher. As I look about me and see the fine men now holding positions of responsibility in our public schools I wonder how many of them would be preparing to teach if they were attending college today instead of twenty years ago. Most of them went through college with little or no thought of teaching, but as graduation time approached they found themselves high and dry. They had a college education, but what the could they do to earn a living? Ah, teach! At least until they found something better or made enough money to pay their tuition in a law school. But once in the high school with a physical geography text in their hand asking questions the significance...
