A review from the past published in The Bystander: An Illustrated Weekly 1905: THERE is much of the brute side of man in Kiplings stories; but Mr. Jack London, the American novelist, excels all the dealers in brutality, and in that extraordinary tale, Btard, which appears in The Faith of Man, there is an episode which this man and dog fight recalled to my mind. Here we are shown a man and a dog who are associated, not by the usual bond of love, or animal devotion to a kind master, but by mutual enmity. The master hates and ill-treats his dog, and the dog hates his master, yet the one has no desire to be rid of the dog, nor the other to leave his master. But the dog cherishes the thought of revenge for all his ill-usage when he feels himself strong enough to try conclusions, and the day comes when he has his master by the throat. The man might draw his knife and kill the dog in an instant, but the beast in him was up...
