Excerpt from An Adequate Ministry: A Sermon, Delivered Before the American Education Society, at the Anniversary Meeting in Boston, May 25, 1869 Without attempting any extended illustration of the thought represented by that phrase, faithful men, I may say that of course no man is worthy to be trusted with the ministry of the Gospel unless, in humble and penitent faith, he has received that Gospel into his own soul. How can any man be intrusted with the Gospel if he gives no evidence of having experienced its saving power? Nay, such evidence on that point as might suffice for his admission to communion in the church, is not sufficient for his admission to participate in the ministry of the Gospel. The only true idea of the man worthy to be thus intrusted, is the idea of one who can be readily recognized as a man of God, a man of prayer, a man diligent in the self-discipline of the Christian life, a man growing in grace and in that knowledge of Christ which comes from the experience of his power to save. Such are the faithful men, the men whose moral and spiritual qualities make them fit to be trusted with this ministry.
