Lack of public money made these of short terms. The poor salaries commanded inefficient teaching talent. Inefficient teachers gave inefficient instruction, and so the public schools suffered both in character and usefulness. In the efforts to secure qualified teachers was discovered Alabama Polytechnic Institute. the need of normal schools, and the State, in the kindness of her mother heart, established these at Florence, Jacksonville, Livingston, and Troy, adopting courses admitting classes of all grades and granting diplomas to students taking special normal training. The State has also established an agricultural school in each of the nine congressional districts. The public schools have done vast good to the State, and public sentiment is pressing the General Assembly Dr. William Leroy Broun. to munificent appropriations for their maintenance. Population and wealth are increasing. New industries and new enterprises are calling for quickened intelligence and technical training. The Polytechnic Institute at Auburn, established in 1872, has attained a proud eminence among the technical colleges of the nation. Under the presidency of the scholarly educator, Dr. William Leroy Broun, with an able and devoted faculty, it is sending forth experts to develop and sustain the industries of the country. Its graduates have held high positions in the engineering fields of Mexico and Africa, and in all the pursuits of business within the United States. Departments of literature, science, agriculture, and military training make it an institution of high merit. The Medical College at Mobile...
