Excerpt: . . . signs which would suggest pulmonary tuberculosis. Her throat we can undoubtedly rule out as a cause of her cough, as I said before. Can it be that this is simply a nervous type of cough and that it does not rest upon any definite pathologic basis This would hardly be considered on account of her temperature and general appearance. The positive DEspines sign gives us the clue and I think we can make a diagnosis of enlargement of the tracheobronchial lymph-nodes as a cause for her cough. The brassy character of the cough is also in favor of this as an etiologic agent. It is not difficult to decide that her cough is due to this cause, but it is quite another question what has caused enlargement of these nodes. It is not possible to say, from the physical examination or from her history,...
