

A Priori Knowledge and Analytic Truth

By John-Michael Kuczynski

CreateSpace Independent Publishing Platform. Paperback. Condition: New. This item is printed on demand. 416 pages. Dimensions: 9.0in. x 6.0in. x 0.9in. This book answers three questions: (i) What is it for a statement to be analytically true (ii) What is a priori knowledge (How does it differ from inherited empirical knowledge And how does it differ from acquired conceptual (non-empirical) knowledge, such as ones knowledge that not all continuous functions are differentiable). (iii) Do we have a priori knowledge It is shown that content-externalism is an epistemologization of the (logically, not psychologically) innocuous fact that, if a sentence S of natural language expresses a multiply quantified generalization, S also expresses each quantified generalization obtained by permuting the quantifiers in it. It is also shown that, through judicious usage of Kaplans dthat-operator, the shred of truth in content externalism can be reconciled with the datum that, in virtue of having a given representational content R, a mental state M has causal powers that it would not otherwise have. And it is thereby shown how to reconcile content-externalism, so far as the latter is true, with the legitimacy of individualist approaches to psychology. Finally, it is shown that content-externalism embodies a crude and...
