Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from Armin of the West The lanes of mid-Devon are very muddy in winter time. None more so than those which descend into the old coach-road between Okehampton and the village of Sticklepath. They are like muddy tributaries feeding a river. There is plenty of traffic along this road, especially on Saturday, which is market day in Okehampton; but the lanes are always lonely. They are dark, too, and the lop-sided oaks which stretch their crooked branches from one stone hedge to the other creak as the wind from Dartmoor strikes them. It is that wind which makes them lop-sided. When strangers meet in one of these lanes they can hardly pass without a word of greeting. When one stranger is a young man and the other a young maid there is often a certain amount of awkwardness; with blushes on one side and bold glances on the other. Sometimes the bold glances are reciprocated, which is natural enough, if foolish, and dangerous - especially so when the primroses are in bud and there is warm...
