Also the association of the perfect stem with the pluperfect subjunctive of the active would tend to make it seem appropriate in the passive, though here, of course, the idea of completed action is already conveyed by the perfect participle. 112. itnrus erat: R. L. P. 440 (d). This is a most useful periphrasis for iisset, which is implied in it (see note on l. 40). Besides its metrical convenience, it supplies a means of turning unfulfilled conditions into infinitive or dependent subjunctive forms; e.g. I say that he would have gone , dico eum iturum fuisse; so rogo num. (non dubium est quin., .; sequitur -/.) Hums fuerit. 113. tua munera: poetical plural for singular. Achilles had spared her life at the sack of Lyrnesus. 114. Repeats the meaning of l. 113, but with additional point given by the contrast between hostis and...
