Not illustrated. 1890 Excerpt: . . . in the way he did: -- He was obeying the orders of his employers, the exporters, to use every known device to land his cattle alive at Deptford. They would die like sheep, he 1 When once the cattle get adrift, the attendants cannot go amongst them so as to give them water: it would cost them their lives, or at least terrible injuries; therefore they never now attempt it. --S. P. gruffly remarked, if they were not roughly handled. When the cattle were finally landed at Deptford, many were so weak that they staggered about, and fell down helplessly. These the butchers quickly killed. A ship which left America on September 7, with 360 head of cattle, was caught in a cyclone when three days out. She arrived Friday, the 27th, with only fourteen (!) head of live cattle; the remainder had died during the fearfully stormy passage. The captains report of the scenes of the sufferings of the cattle on board this ship is too horrible to publish. I may state here, that the information I have received from many witnesses orally, during the last three months, is entirely of the same character, and that I can produce some of the witnesses. One witness, George Pirrett, says that on one ship in which he sailed the firemen had all to help to get eighty dead cattle overboard after a gale; their bodies were in the tween decks--i. e. below the main deck--and they had...
