Translation Studies. 2x6 consists of short stanzories stanzas that are also stories, each one relating an encounter between two people. Appearing in English, French, Spanish, Russian, Japanese, and Polish, the stanzories are generated by a similar underlying process, even as they do not correspond to one another the way a translation typically does to a source text. These simple programs can endlessly churn out combinatorial lines that challenge to reader to determine to whom she and he, and him and her, refer, as well as which is the more powerful one, which the underdog. As John Cayley writes, Gender is the chief generative obstacle here making more than two times six distributed across the natural grammars of these micro- dramas, with their psychosocial, vocational, and hierarchical narrative vectors.
