Still another method of indicating variability is by means of giving the deviation for each of the items from some central figure which may be agreed upon. In the tables which follow, the deviations are calculated from the median. The median, which is simply the point above and below which fifty per cent, of the cases lie, is, we believe, the best figure to use in this case as representing a central tendency. It is unambiguous and is not so much influenced by extreme cases nor by error as the average would be. EXPLANATION OF TABLES...
