Excerpt from The Arrangement of Farm Fields The number of fields which it is desirable to have on a farm will depend upon the rotation followed. There should be a field for each year of the rotation. In addition to this, many farmers like to have an odd field for miscellaneous or extra crops where more or less of a crop can be grown without breaking up the established rotation. Some have three or four of these small fields and carry on a minor rotation in addition to the main crop rotation. In some cases where there are certain special crops, such as tobacco, potatoes, silage corn, or soiling crops, this may be advantageous, but it is usually desirable to work these crops into the general field system; they can be more economically handled in that manner. The fields in the minor rotation should be located close to the barns and immediately connected with the farmstead. In few instances would it be practical for a farmer to make radical readjustments in the field arrangement of his farm all at once....
