Excerpt from Melton De Mowbray, or the Banker s Son, Vol. 2 of 3: A Novel In the changes of happiness, however, our memory turns to dwell upon the past; it loves to linger with the ruins which time has seared, and, even while we spread our sails anew, and dance upon the joyous billows in the bark built from the wreck we have sustained, we are loath to confess that good can spring from evil, happiness from suffering. What mother, who has felt the agony of losing her first-born in its infancy, is ready to allow the sacred joy with which she recalls the early promise of the opening bud; or how, while she clothes the departed cherub with the bright perfections of a dream, is she the happier for the lesson given to affections warped by blind excess the happier for having lost her babe in the beauty of innocence, than if she had seen the spoiled child become the heartless man, and felt the sting of the serpent she had unwisely nurtured in her dotting bosom?
