This is, primarily, the idea I meant to bring before the reader. Let me, however, add that I had in my mind at the time I penned the words the thought that there was a purpose in this original association, that it was not fortuitous but designed--nor do I now desire in anywise to qualify the term almost unconsciously so employed. If Mr. Tansley asks what are accidental adaptations, let me briefly instance the case of exotic insects through man s agency imported into a country where the indigenous flora is distinct from that of the creatures native habitat. A large proportion of them would probably perish for want of suitable food--possibly all. Some few, however, might contrive to exist--some few even flourish upon plants differing from their natural food, e.g., the wellknown instance of silkworms feeding upon lettuce leaves. In many instances both animals and plants so introduced have so effectually adapted themselves to their new conditions, to the detriment of the natives, that they have not only brought about the latter s decrease, but often their actual extirpation. It cannot be said that in these instances the mutual adaptations of the introduced plants or animals are other than accidental, since the change has been brought about by no purely natural process but solely through the agency of man. On the other hand these same creatures--say insects--in their native habitat feed upon its indigenous flora, and in process...
