Martin, of Ohio, on the Slavery Question: Delivered in the House of Representatives, May 19, 1860 Such sympathy was not necessary for its occurrence, nor can it be obtained for its repetition. Those marauders were doubtless encouraged by the unpatriotic teachings of the leaders of the self-styled Republican party. For that party has notoriously and unblushingly employed every epithet of disparagement, and every form of misrepresentation of the people and institutions of the slaveholding States. Its orators and press have been too successful in their efforts to incense the great mass of the party with bitter hostility toward their confederate brethren of the South. And, alas! too often has religions fanaticism been invoked and the sacred office debased in fomenting strife and discontent under the wholesome restraint of existing laws. The thorough investigation now being prosecuted before the Senate committee, will, in my judgment, undoubtedly show that of the teeming millions of the North but a very insignificant and irresponsible number were actually implicated in that raid. Nevertheless, sir, the offence was of the gravest character. The States of this Union, in the formation of the Confederacy, deposed, to a very material extent, the character and functions of independent sovereignties, and invested the central Government with the duty and power of protecting each and all the States. By the terms of the constitutional compact, the States voluntarily deprived themselves of the power to lay duties and keep troops or ships of war in time of peace. These high qualities of sovereignty are solely conferred on the General Government; and the privileges of citizenship are extended and guarantied alike to all the citizens of the...
