Excerpt from Annals of Wyoming, Vol. 6: July-October, 1929 Long after we had the fire out and the place well soaked and out of danger of any further damage we left while the remaining four were busily engaged in trying to improve each other s none too prepossessing countenances. We had approached within about 50 feet of our camp when Quan trel, looking backward, called out, Look at that son of a gun with the pitchfork. One fellow was standing over the one who had been knocked out with the bucket of water and was making passes at him with the fork, but when he made a stab at him missed his mark and drove the fork into the ground so deep. That it required some effort to pull it out, and when he did recover it, went over backwards and lost the fork in the creek. Then crawling upon his hands and knees removed the wreck of the bucket from the fel low s head and taking it in his lap began moaning and croon ing over him. Perceiving that the war...
