Excerpt from New Zealand and Its Aborigines: Being an Account of the Aborigines, Trade, and Resources of the Colony; And the Advantages It Now Presents as a Field for Emigration and the Investment of Capital The first two chapters of the present work were written so long ago as 1840, and forwarded by letter to England, with a view of furnishing information as to the character of the Aborigines of New Zealand, about whom so very little was then known to the British public. Like many other letters, however, from New Zealand, these never relied their destination; and other occupations prevented me from recurring to the subject until circumstances led me to re-visit Britain, when, to beguile a few of the tedious hours of a five months homeward voyage, I again transcribed my manuscript, believing that the information it affords may still be found useful, notwithstanding the number of works which have already been published on the same subject.
