Excerpt from The Wellesley Magazine, Vol. 5: November 21, 1896 Falstaff was seldom placed in any very perilous position, but Zagloba seemed to have a faculty for getting into trouble. He did not seek posts of responsibility, but he always had them thrust upon him. And he was equal to any emergency. He could command a camp with the dignity of a starosta. He took great care always to have the bunchuk waving above his head, and gave orders with such an imposing air that he even impressed Pan Yan and Pan Michael, though they both knew perfectly well that the old fraud would have been frightened to death if he had actually been attacked. He insisted on going to comfort Pan Michael for the death of his sweetheart and although he did not hasten with the speed which his traveling shirt rubbed with goats tallow might indicate, still he arrived at just the right moment, and his rather vigorous method of sympathy was the one of all others best suited to the case. When Basia, his little haiduk, lay between...
