THE RUDIMENTARY ARITHMETIC OF PREMATURE DEATH. Of the twenty-five millions (25,000,000) of people who form the population of England and Wales, half a million or thereabout (500,000) die, on the average, every year. Of these deaths one-tenth only (50,000) are of persons who have reached the full term of life, namely, seventy- five years and upwards; nine-tenths are premature, that is to say, are deaths of persons whose lives have been cut short before the expiration of their natural term. Somewhat less than one-fourth of the 450,000 persons who every year die prematurely (24 per cent. - 100,000) die in infancy; somewhat over four-tenths (41 per cent. = 184,500), including those who die in infancy, die by the time the fifth year of life is completed; the deaths of the remaining six-tenths nearly (59 per cent. = 266,000) are distributed pretty equally over the. period of life between childhood and old age. Premature death, as here considered, comprehends all deaths except deaths from old age. The distinction is not a mere verbal redundancy. It marks a point of view from which the contemplation of death is best approached for the purposes of health preservation whether in its public or its private aspects. A just sense of the gravity and scope of the questions involved in the advancement of the health, whether of a community, or of a household, or of an individual, is in the main dependent upon the accuracy of our conceptions as to the prematureness of the vastly greater number of the deaths which occur among a population. The foundation of preventive medicine - or, as it is termed in its more familiarly known aspect, sanitary...
