This work had been going on for some time and every morning Marshall would visit the works, and after the gates had been closed and the water ceased flowing, he would walk down the uncompleted mill-race to see what had been accomplished the night before and the day previous. CHAPTER VI. The Discovery of Gold. We are now approaching the most important event of California history, for on the occasion of which we are about to speak, Marshall had strolled to the lower end of the race where he stood for a moment, looking down along the bottom. At this juncture his eyes were attracted to a glittering substance which lay beneath the water in a crevice of the bedrock. He stooped and picked it up. It was of a yellow color, unlike anything he had ever seen before. It must be a mineral of some kind, he thought, and he tried to recall everything he had ever heard, or read about the various minerals and rocks. Then the thought came to him, could it be gold as he remembered reading, gold was yellow in color, heavy and malleable. He tried the latter test and then leisurely sought the company of his workmen and made known to them his find. This was on Wednesday, the 19th day of January, 1848, according to Marshall s own statement. The nugget weighed about six pennyweights (or $5.00). After passing a...
